By Kendra Cherry Buy textbooks for your psychology courses can be very expensive, with some texts costing hundreds of dollars each. While you certainly can't eliminate this expense, there are a few questions you can ask yourself at the beginning of each semester to help track your textbook budget. Before buying a psychology book, ask yourself these important questions: If you are majoring in psychology, keeping all your course textbooks can be a great idea, especially if you plan to attend graduate studies in psychology. As you progress in your academic search for psychology, you may often find yourself referring to texts from previous courses. When it's time to take the psychology discipline test, you'll have a useful library to study in exam preparation. If you plan to keep your book at the end of the course, look for a new copy of the text or a used copy that is in optimal condition. Buying used copies of your psychology books is a great way to save money every semester. Used books are generally much more accessible than new books, but it is important to carefully inspect your copy to ensure it is in good condition. A textbook that has missing pages or is full of highlights and notes can make study very difficult. Fortunately, many used copies are still in such a new condition, which makes this a great option for cost-conscious psychology students. Although a book may be listed on the required reading list, it does not necessarily mean that the teacher will actually use the book as part of lectures, discussions, or exams. If you're not sure if the book will actually be needed, wait until the first day of class when you can look at the class program to see if the schedule includes assigned readings of the book. Consider asking other students who have already taken the class about whether they actually used the book in class. If the book is simply out of your budget, there are other ways for you to acquire the text. Consider borrowing the book from another student who has already finished the course. It can also be to share the book with another student in the class, but you will need to be careful to draw up a schedule that allows both of you plenty of time to read and study. If all else fails, talk to your instructor. Many faculty members of the faculty have access to several copies of the book, so they may even be willing to lend you a copy for the duration of the lesson. Many psychology courses include mandatory reading as well as supplementary reading. These complementary texts aim to deepen their knowledge on the subject, but are not necessary to actually pass the course. If you can afford it, buying the additional books can be a great way to learn more about the topic. However, you should not feel pressured to buy these books if they are out of your budget. If you choose to purchase them, consider looking for used copies as a way to reduce costs. Thanks for your feedback! What are your concerns?
